logistics of trouser lengths and suit sleeves. Veterans like Arjun Khanna and Narendra Kumar saw their ranks swell with names like Nandita Mahtani, who launched her menswear line, and newbies such as Digvijay Singh and Abdul Halder. With Park Avenue also giving into the ramp razzmatazz, with Gautam Singhania and wife Nawaz as showstoppers, corporate statements also made a prosaic presentation.

With over eight designers presenting couture candy for men, fashion watchers fantasised about spotting some spectacular sartorial style but came away with a chequered view of things. Menswear mogul Khanna's sharp Jodhpurs with print motifs, smocking and leather patches began as a testosterone-laden promising line but dwindled into a long saga of over-embellished outfits. Abhishek Dutta gained more notoriety for sending his two-year-old on the ramp—who stumbled off it—than for his cluttered kurtas. But menswear was saved from being a manic disaster thanks to Ahmedabad-based newcomer Digvijay Singh's collection titled Patina. Halder also managed to save some part of the day with his all brown
