

exhibition

Indian Imprint

DELHI There was a time when photographers had to fight for space to showcase their work in art galleries. But thanks to soaring prices and increasing international visibility, it is the galleries which are now competing with hotels and public spaces to attract photographers. Auction houses and coverage of their work by the media have only added to what can be called the photographic revolution.

The latest to join the line of galleries promoting photography is the Vadehra Art Gallery, which recently announced its foray into photography in collaboration with Fotomedia, with the launch of its exhibition called 'Click!—Contemporary Photography in India'. Curated by Sunil Gupta and Radhika Singh, the exhibition will display more than 100 images from as many as 86 photographers.

The exhibition aims to "explore the Indian condition through photography", which includes looking at the strategies for both, pure documentation as well as creative experimentation employed by photographers over a period of time. It will also reflect on the themes, landscapes and images that have captured the imagination of the photographers.

The oral tradition in India has over the years, been replaced by photography. With single works as well as groups of photographs, the underlying theme remains "the relationship between an individual and the society, experience and memory, life and death". The photographers whose works will be on display include a cross-section of professionals in India—from documentary photographers such as Pablo Bartholomew and Prashant Panjiar to art photographers Vivan Sundaram, Claire Arni and Anita Dube, along with big draws like Prabuddha Das Gupta and Pamela Singh.

A part of the exhibition will travel to London and will be on view at the Grosvenor Vadehra till March 27. The good thing about photography is that unlike paintings, it can be at two places at the same time. At Vadehra Art Gallery. From March 1.

by Nirmala Ravindran

SHOES AND STRINGS: One of the photographs on display

True to Life

MUMBAI Through City Log 07/08, Jeet Ganguly allows the viewer to experience and see the obvious in a different light. Ganguly creates imagery, which urges the audience to engage in a discourse over change. In reaction to the blatant disregard for the old—objects and people that have been an intrinsic part of his childhood memories—he uses images and situations reminiscent of his growing years. "I have tried to use images and situations as the main subject of my work, where objects and people from an era slowly fading away into distant memory jostle for space amidst a new India," says Ganguly. His style of work is part of popular culture and the use of colours resembles packages on display in a shop, with barcode accentuating that fact. "I felt a need to preserve these times through my work," he adds. At Lansdowne Gallery, till March 15.

by Swati Mathur

REMINISCENCES: Ganguly's Car and Elephant

art exhibition

Woman Power

DELHI Indian women artists have carved a niche for themselves. This is in ample display at the exhibition titled 'Shakti—Women in the Vanguard of Indian Art', curated by Anjolie Ela Menon. The exhibition includes works by Arpana Caur, Anupam Sud, Angeli Sovani, Ayesha

Broota's untitled work

Seth, Vasundhara Tewari Broota, Nayanaa Kanodia, Madhvi Parekh, Vibha Desai, Yuriko Lochan and others. At Lalit Kala Akademi, from March 6.