

FOOD court

A GLIMPSE OF WHAT'S SETTING THE CAPITAL'S
EAT STREETS ABUZZ

Delhi's bellies

It's a bright Sunday afternoon, the kind a retreating winter throws at you, when we join Hemanshu Kumar and his group, Eating Out in Delhi (EOiD), in the bylanes of Sadar Bazaar. Kumar's online community is dedicated to unearthing 'Delhi's offbeat eating joints, which are low on pretension and high on value for money' and meets about twice a month to try out new places. With 30-odd excursions behind it, the group is a pro at hunting out hidden gems. Kumar first started the EOiD community on Orkut in 2006, post his return to India from Chicago, where he was pursuing higher studies. "Pizzas were fine, but I sorely missed the street food of Delhi," says 30-year-old Kumar, who

Look out for

■ Drop in for a quick pre-plated vegetarian or non-vegetarian thali for lunch. Choose from a scrumptious selection of kebabs, curries, rice, breads and dessert, all served at one go. All through March. At Dhaba, The Claridges. Call:

41335082. Prices: Non-veg: Rs 1,100 plus taxes. Veg: Rs 900 plus taxes.

■ Develop a worldly-wise sweet tooth. From March 23 to March 30, guests can dig into an appetising array which includes plum strudels from Austria, chocolate fountain from Belgium and mango pudding from China.

RUBEN SINGH

Kumar (in red and black) with his group, Eating Out in De

Jap in a box

If you like to experiment with your palate and a taste of Japan is what you prefer, this one's for you. Gurgaon-based Sushi King, a two-month old home delivery service for those in Delhi, Noida and Faridabad, delivers freshly-made sushis right at your doorstep. Says co-founder Sandeep Bansal, who manages a software firm, and is a self-confessed foodie: "Our aim was to open a Japanese restaurant but due to space problems, we couldn't.