hi, at Al-Zahid Nemat Kada in Sadar Bazaar

teaches economics at the Delhi School of Economics. Overwhelmed by the response for his Orkut community, which now has about 350 members, Kumar started a blog to record his food forays. From Afghan food in Lajpat Nagar and Korean food in Green Park to nihari at Bada Hindu Rao and chaat in Old Delhi, Kumar's blog is a rich chronicle of gastronomic delights. "The group has people in their 20s and 30s, who don't mind eating in places without air-conditioning and are willing to experiment," says Kumar. US resident Jenny Steeves is all praise for EOid: "I'm wary of eating street food, but I trust Hemanshu's suggestions." Adds Manik Suri, who's been with the group for a year: "The food trips are as much about food as about discovering Delhi's culture." Log on to eoid.blogspot.com for more.

However, the response to Sushi King has been good." Launched after a year of research which included food trials with Japanese expats and identifying products and spaces, Bansal sold his first order for sushi on December 21, 2007. Manning his kitchen is chef Deepak Sarkar, who has set up Japanese kitchens in Bangalore and other places. In addition to traditional sushi rolls, there are versions of pepper chicken, ham, pork salami and bacon for meat lovers. "All raw materials, condiments, pickles and spices are imported from Japan," says Bansal. Packaging is another concern that has been taken care of. "My kitchen is air-conditioned and we pack the sushis with Japanese gel ice to prevent the heat from destroying the taste," says Bansal. Call 95124-4005000 or order on www.sushiking.in.
