

Losing It

Rani Mukerji wants to play 'Biggest Loser' just like Kareena Kapoor. Taking cue from Bebo, Mukerji has taken to yoga and jogging to drop her perennially present pounds. The actress has even hand-picked Kapoor's instructor Payal Gidwani who works with her two hours everyday. "Rani is my challenge. I want to bring her down to 45 kg," says Gidwani. We hope yoga can fight Mukerji's genes, since all else seems to have failed.

BELLY BREAK

Rakhi Sawant and Mallika Sherawat's thrones are in danger. Apoorva Lakhia has shot an item number with Turkish belly dancer Tanyeli, for his movie Mission Istanbul. "I heard her show was sold out when we were shooting in Istanbul," says Lakhia, who wanted to shoot in Turkey. When this wasn't feasible, he brought her to Mumbai. The dancer apparently charges $25,000 a day but wasn't as heavy on his pocket as he agreed to shoot her next video. Hope it's worth it.

Driving Force

Deepali Amrit Khalko has gone where no woman from Ranchi has ever gone before—onto the railway engine driver's seat. The 30-year-old tribal joined the capital's railway division a month ago as assistant loco-pilot. "Due to safety reasons, I have been asked to work during the day but I'm not complaining," says Khalko. "She's become a role model," says her husband Atit Khalko, who can't stop praising her. Now if only there were more rest rooms for women drivers, Khalko says. Then her job would be hitch-free.

POWER LISTING

She was Gordon Brown's special adviser for eight years. Now, the Indian-origin Shriti Vadera has taken the 20th spot as the most powerful woman in public enterprise in a top-100 list compiled by The Daily Telegraph. Vadera is the parliamentary under-secretary of state in the UK's Department of Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform and was an investment banker with UBS Warburg. She beat BBC Worldwide Chief Executive John Smith, Takeover Panel Chairman Peter Scott and Channel 4 Chairman Luke Johnson. More power to ya.
