

ISHAN TANKHA

"Best of India",
November 26, 2007

"Breath-taking pictures and a succinct narration made the issue a reader's delight. It is an eye-opener for those who cannot see beyond the poverty line."

Y.G. CHOUKSEY, Pune

Country-made

It was disappointing to see the North-east not being covered in the issue ("Best of India", November 26). One is then forced to conclude that either the perspective about this region is still to change or the magazine's correspondents are ignorant about this place.
NANDAN PHUKAN, Guwahati

The write-ups in the issue made me feel refreshed and doubly assured of the country's beauty, variety and vitality. How much of it will see us through in these difficult times is, however, a different matter.
S.C. KAPOOR, Noida

The special issue only highlighted the best of high society in urban India, leaving little space for rural India. It would have been better had the magazine struck a balance between the two.
P. GANESHAN, Visakhapatnam

Most of the experiences featured in the issue are nothing but a waste of valuable resources by some self-centred people who do not care about the unprivileged of the country.
ASHUTOSH MEHER, Sambalpur

The issue was like a journey in a time machine through the cultural, spiritual and social landscape of the country. It turned out to be a comforting travel experience for the mind and the soul.
VITULL K. GUPTA, Bhatinda

One could easily discern that the places and things were chosen on the basis of their economic importance. They were not really the best.
NARESH KUMAR, on e-mail

It is worth wondering why INDIA TODAY, a magazine known in the 1980s for incisive and investigative journalism, has come to depend upon recycled material like this to fill in the odd gaps.

CHANDRASEKAR K., Chennai

Caught Red-handed

The magazine has done a great job in bringing out the excesses in Nandigram ("The Marxist Horror Story", November 26). It teaches the other states a lesson—never to allow the menace of Communism grow in their states.
G. RAMACHANDRAN, Thiruvananthapuram

The double standards in political ideology and the mayhem perpetrated by the Communists in Nandigram spell the beginning of the end of mindless Marxism prevalent in the country.
K.V. RAGHURAM, Wayanad

It is surprising to see the way Nandigram has silenced the Communists, who, only a few days ago, had been baying for Gujarat Chief Minister

Narendra Modi's blood over a sting operation.
ABHILASH THADHANI, on e-mail

The Nandigram massacre marks the arrival of a new brand of governance. From now on, organised crime will be run by the new-age feudal lords under political protection.
KARAN KHARB, Noida

Nandigram is just the tip iceberg of the tactics that CPI(M) uses to stay in power. It is the Union Government's silence on the brutal massacre of innocent people which is more glaring than the act itself.
INDU SHANKAR DUBE, Varanasi

That the Communist chief minister does not regret the killings speaks volumes about the disadvantages of keeping a single party in power for long. The time is ripe for the people of West Bengal to think about a coalition set-up for the state as is the case in Kerala.
