

The Giant's Causeway in Ireland; humbling even the biggest of us.

I first heard of the Causeway at a lively street corner in Belfast one night. A group of musicians were singing a song about a particular legend that caught my ear. True to its name, the Giant's Causeway was apparently once the setting of a duel for supremacy between two giants one of them, Finn McCool scared the other one away by introducing himself as his own child. As luck would have it, the musicians were en-route north to the Causeway themselves and I gladly hitched a ride with them. So off we went taking the coastal route from Belfast via the Carrick-a-Rede Rope Bridge to the Causeway. And yet on getting there, I discovered it to be the setting for quite another heavyweight duel. On one hand, the ruthless force of the Atlantic washing away everything that stood in its path. On the other, rare six sided basalt rocks meshing together in a defensive fortress above the water. Back and forth they tussled and have so relentlessly since the beginning of time. Tides changed and tilted the balance in favour of one over the other. And then I realized there was a victor; I who was witness to the beauty of it all.
