Role reversal

As families change, new age fathers don't mind staying at home to have lunch with their children, help them with homework and attend PTA meetings

Oishee Dutta remembers the first time she encountered death. She was all of five, watching Lion King on an afternoon show, and couldn't understand why Simba's father had left him. "Where has he gone," she had asked. Her father, Anik Dutta explained that Simba's father had died. "I always asked my father the bigger questions, as I spent more time with him," says Oishee, now 15. She is also one of those lucky girls who gets to lunch with her father every day. While her mother Sondhy is busy working, her father makes up for her absence. He stays up nights working on Oishee's science projects and attends open house interactions in school, while her mother almost never makes it. "I want to be like dad when I grow up because I would have more time at hand," says Oishee, a student of La Martiniere School, Kolkata.
