ignation and its timing saying, "There is no real right time for a decision like this except for the fact that you must truly enjoy the job."

But for captain, there is always one right time—the period in which he finds the opportunity to tell, not the wider world, but the men he led that he can no longer do the job. In that regard, Dravid slipped badly as a dazed and confused Indian team playing the T20 World Cup learnt long distance that its captain had abandoned the ship. A former teammate remarked that in a career of impeccable conduct, this was "Rahul's first big slip-up".

The ironies of Indian cricket are never mildly amusing, they tend to be extreme. In the hours leading up to Dravid's departure, it was Ganguly's name that began to be whispered when it was known that Sachin Tendulkar was not enthusiastic. Eventually the job went to a relative rookie. Four seasons ago, just before the Indians embarked on their tour of Australia, one of Ganguly's friends was heading off to see Indian Airlines play a local game in Delhi. Ganguly, then the captain who had taken India to the World Cup final, had given his friend a tip. "Look out for this guy, chabook player hai," he said, "chabook" being the Indianism for quality. "His name is Dhoni," Ganguly said and added, "India khele ga." ■
