

A BIASED BENCHMARK

Top B-schools in India rank abysmally low on diversity. It is about time they revamped the selection procedure in order to produce well-rounded global managers for the future.

SAURABH SINGH

■ By Diksha Madhok

It is a nationally-acknowledged fact that Indian Institute of Management (IIM) graduates form one of the most intellectually elite clubs of the country. Interestingly, it mainly comprises engineers and is overwhelmingly dominated by men. Is the intelligence ratio that skewed in our country? Certainly, there are statistics that seem to support this assumption. Of the total applicants at IIM-Bangalore for the Post Graduate Programme-2007, 48 per cent were engineers. However, of the total shortlisted candidates, nearly 85 per cent were engineers and unfortunately, less than 18 per cent were women. Perhaps, there is more to it than what meets the eye as this could well be a case of biased selection procedures.

Entry to most of the top B-schools