

a strong backoffice to the world, India is playing host to the MNCs that are queuing up to set up shops here. Indian conglomerates, too, are going global. As a result of this, there is an increasing demand for people with international exposure who can co-ordinate well between offices across countries and who can work smoothly in different cultures.

The global leap

MBA classrooms can no longer look at what's happening closer home without considering the international political and economic scenario; a steady watch on international trends is a must. Requirement for a thorough understanding of the world economy would mean increased focus on international case studies.

Courses would aim to spread awareness about the political and social history, culture and economy of various countries, and encourage knowledge of languages other than English to make the new-age managers conduct business with ease in Future programmes will see borderless, possibly institutionless, teaching of management principles by experts.
