REVVING UP INTIMACY

Amazingly, Lucknow tops the list with 26 per cent couples having sex till their partner is satisfied. As far as experimenting is concerned and places where sexual play is extended to, Bangalore tops the list, with a high 24 per cent making love in the kitchen. No other city came close. The acceptance of pornography as a form of sexual play has also increased amongst women. In 2003, only 28 per cent women were ready to see porn with their partner even as 16 per cent refused it outright. The figure has risen in 2007 with 41 per cent admitting to watching porn with their husbands.

of husbands and wives. This is not merely in respect to the double standard that enables men to be more sexually adventurous both before and after marriage, or in the male exaggeration and female underestimation of coital frequency (52 per cent husbands to 27 per cent wives claim to have sex more than thrice a week), but also in their perceptions of the importance of sex in their lives, the reasons for having sex (one's own vs the partner's pleasure), and the impact of joint family living on conjugal relations—a bit of a dampener, according to many men (but interestingly not women) in the sample.

Compared to today's lengthy multi-question, multi-option surveys, Ghurye's survey was remarkably concise: just 13 questions, of which the first five sought material details about the age, education and occupation of husband and wife, and the length of their marriage. As against today's market-survey questionnaires, where the respondent is obliged to tick off one or the other of the predetermined responses or fall into the statistically anomalous don't know/ won't say category, Ghurye's subjects actually gave voice to some very personal predilections and dilemmas. As Ghurye faithfully recorded, for many men, the frequency of coitus was something that was sternly governed by self-imposed rules of conduct (coitus every day; every other day; for a few days in succession followed by a gap of some days; every alternate day beginning a week after the end of his wife's period; or only on auspicious days of the month, generally numbering about five). In other words, coitus—
