"60 Revolutions",
December 31, 2007

"In an era where a hypnotising media glamourises indecent and culturally polluted images, issues like this help us remember our roots and history."

VITULL K. GUPTA, Bhatinda

Nostalgic Trip

The revolutions featured in the magazine have been great revelations ("60 Revolutions", December 31). It is a nostalgic journey into the past, presented in a capsule form. The issue is a collector's item.

VIRENDRA KUMAR TANGRI,
Dehradun

In this issue you have presented an India which we, countrymen were desirous to know about.

The magazine's editorial team deserves all the appreciation for enlightening us.

S.K. AGGARWAL, Amritsar

Despite these 60 revolutions, which have made Brand India a force to reckon with, we have many miles to go before we can call ourselves developed. Though affluence is no longer a dirty word today, there are millions of people in the country who go without two square meals a day.

D.B.N. MURTHY, Bangalore

Finally, here is an issue that lists the important changes that have taken place in an independent India. May you come up with more such articles.
VINAY R.M., Bangalore

I am yet to see an issue that covers the country and its people so comprehensively. INDIA TODAY's team deserves special congratulations.
SURINDER KALIA, Gurgaon

The cover story was admirable. The country needs some more revolutions today to foster communal harmony, eradicate corruption and provide quick justice to the poor and the needy.
A. JACOB SAHAYAM,
Thiruvananthapuram

Post-Independence era for the country has been a mixed bag: there have been an array of notable achievements, galling shortfalls in vital areas of national life, rising violence and crime coupled with divisive politics.

S.C. KAPOOR, Noida

Class Conscious

The issue reinforced my belief that INDIA TODAY is a status quo-ist kind of a magazine with deep-rooted and discreet antipathy towards some groups—like the backward classes ("Divide and Rule", December 31). When it says, "the caste of an idiot can defeat the merit of the intelligent," it, in a way, labels a quarter of the country's population as idiots.

MANISH CHANDRA, on e-mail

Purpose Defeated

ITTS and IIMS have indeed become brands in the world market today ("Empires of the Mind", December 31). Yet the question remains: are these premier institutions meant for the MNCs? Whatever happened to Jawaharlal Nehru's vision of using this raw talent for building the nation?

AMITABH THAKUR, Lucknow

No Marx

One is at a loss to understand the reason for Prakash Karat being taken so seriously ("Full Marx", December 24). To any ordinary citizen of the country, he is just one of those dogmatic Marxists who just cannot budge from their "ideological antiquity".

R. ADAIKALADOSS,
Trichirapalli

The story clearly brings to the fore the fact that Karat's policies are against the country's interests and are meant to weaken India vis-à-vis China. Why is Congress President Sonia Gandhi tolerating him, or is she a part of the "great game"?
