ever had. By the end of the year, there was a sense of weariness with celebrities as they wanted to be seen, those supernovas who appeared when their movies had to be promoted, their love lives had to be repaired and their families had to be protected. The cameras followed them as they visited temples, mosques, gurudwaras, court houses and prison cells. They resented being kept out of the two big weddings of the year (one out of sheer desire for privacy, another, that of Liz Hurley and Arun Nayar, because of sheer pelf, £1 million of it). It was quite clear that celebrity coverage would soon reach intrusive levels. Not always would the media allow itself to be used to portray the celebrity as upstanding son, devoted father and doting husband. Dirty linen would be aired and washed in the public laundry, on camera and on screen. Fashion faux pas would be dissected and celebrity love lives would be investigated.

In the era of Facebook friends, YouTube videos and the mobile camera, the conventional media will find itself under increasing pressure to deliver what has not been written about, seen or heard of. No longer will it be enough for celebrities to offer themselves up for appraisal on their time. Soon audiences will demand it all the time.

Yes, the gates of Prateeksha will be breached and the moat to Mannat will be crossed. Soon. ■
