

RANDEEP SINGH

"Sex & Marriage",
November 5, 2007

"A sex-obsessed nation can celebrate and welcome the transformation of a reputed news magazine into a porno journal."

R. VATSYAYAN, Ludhiana

Moot Subject

Full-frontal frequent accounts of sexual practices and preferences—so far confined to the bedrooms—will feed human libido, promote promiscuity and marginalise the hallowed institution of marriage sooner than feared ("Sex & Marriage", November 5). Is this what we want?

SAURABH KAPOOR, Bangalore

Thanks to coffee-table books and surveys like this, women today have been able to recognise their much-ignored sexual desires. The men need to pull their socks and improve their bedtime skills.

SANJAY KAPOOR, Delhi

The magazine is plainly trying to be sensational. No one can otherwise explain 30 sex-obsessed pages with titillating photographs. GOURASWAMY KRISHNA MURTHY, Bangalore

Instead of using its energies to promote sex, the magazine should help stop the degradation of social, moral and cultural values by playing the role of a serious and responsible watchdog of society.

VITULL K. GUPTA, Bhatinda

Such cover photographs do not make the magazine fit family read. Has it run out of news?

M. KUMAR, Delhi

Though the issue touched upon a relevant topic, one fails to understand the need for such a cover picture. It was not unusual to find families shying from picking up the issue. It made them uncomfortable.

RUCHI RAJ, Ghaziabad

Sexual issues, though a taboo in our society, form an important part of our lives. Surveys like this help us to come out with the problems we may be facing in our sexual lives which we may find embarrassing to discuss.

PRIYA SOOD, on e-mail

Stemming the Fall

It is unfortunate that political parties have stooped so low in attacking each other during elections ("Muckrakers at Work", November 5). Fortunately, the Election Commission is well-versed with the role of a regulator. But the moot question is: who will clean the muck?

A. JACOB SAHAYAM, Thiruvananthapuram

Topsy-Turvy Nation

Pakistan has turned into a haven for the most wanted terrorists of the world ("Rising Talibanisation", November 5). Its administration seems to have fallen into the wrong hands and its nuclear potential runs a high risk of being misused.

ARVIND K. PANDEY, Allahabad

The bloodshed in Pakistan has several messages. For Benazir Bhutto, it means she should use the army in trying to curb militancy even though it implies depending on the military again. To the masses, it should convey that terrorism is the greatest threat to democracy.

J.S. ACHARYA, Hyderabad

Taliban was born in Pakistani madarsas. It was financed and trained by ISI. Pakistan today is reaping the fruits of the seeds of terrorism it had sowed.

A. SRIKANTIAH, Bangalore

The Wrong Man

Instead of making political appointments for the governor's post, it would be better to pick retired judges for the job ("Raj Bhawan Raj", November 5). Political appointees cannot and should not be expected to play fair.

MADHU AGRAWAL, Delhi